WHAT WE DO FOR YOU

Our firm specializes in helping business retain a competitive advantage and maximize profitability while maintaining the ability to react quickly and protecting themselves from legal exposure.

DOES YOUR BUSINESS NEED IN-HOUSE COUNSEL?

The question of whether or not your business needs in-house counsel is a complex one that only you and your executive staff can answer. Think about how much time you spend on legalities on a daily or weekly basis, and how confident you are in those legalities. While you can always consult with a business attorney on an as-needed basis, once those hours start to accumulate, you may find the cost of having an attorney on staff is actually lower than paying by the hour.

Generally-speaking, any business that deals with the public, vendors, and other contractual relationships can benefit from legal counsel. The more contracts you sign, the more likely it is you are consulting with an attorney on a daily basis to go over those contracts and make sure they say what you need. If your company is in a position to be sued, or threatened with lawsuits, due to the nature of your business, keeping an attorney on-staff can be an important defensive measure, to protect your company.

NEW BUSINESS FORMATIONS

Forming a business in Florida is not a difficult process. You need to pick a name not already in wide use in the state, determine whether you want your business to be a corporation or limited liability company (LLC), obtain a business license, and register with the state. To complete this process, you do have to meet several requirements, though, including the creation of articles of incorporation and filing for an Employer Identification Number (EIN) with the IRS so your business can be taxed, if your business is a corporation. If you fail to meet these requirements, your business will be operating illegally, which is why many individuals seeking to go into business prefer to let an attorney handle all the paperwork so they know everything has been done properly.

COMMERCIAL AGREEMENTS

As with the papers required to form your business, when it comes to forming commercial agreements with other parties, whether they are clients, vendors, or business partners, you do not want to leave anything out. Ensuring the contract covers every legal issue that might arise between you and the other signing party is one of your greatest defenses against the other party taking legal steps against you if they believe you are in breach of contract. Your experienced contract attorney will find the missing parts of business agreements, ensuring your complete coverage.

PURCHASE OR SALE OF EXISTING BUSINESS

The buying or selling of a business, from a legal standpoint, is about far more than contracts. While the final deal is important, and it is, in fact, the contract that legally finalizes that deal, setting forth the rules, rights, and responsibilities of all parties involved, your attorney is a far more valuable resource than just someone to check over the paperwork. Business sales and acquisitions begin at a point of negotiations, and working with an attorney who knows the best deal to make, and how to get it, can make all the difference in coming out of a business deal completely satisfied.
